The Yellow Wallpaper

Modern Perspective: Charlotte Perkins Gilman

Charlotte Perkins Gilman (1860–1935) was an American writer, philosopher, and activist, best known for her contributions to feminist thought and her writings that explored the condition of women in society. She was a prominent figure in the women's rights movement in the United States and her works had a significant impact on social and political thinking regarding gender equality. Born on July 3, 1860, in Hartford, Connecticut, Charlotte Perkins came from a family with intellectual traditions. Her mother, Mary Fitch Westcott Perkins, was well-educated, but Charlotte’s childhood was marked by instability, as her father abandoned the family when she was very young. This lack of financial security deeply influenced her life, and her personal experiences became a constant source of inspiration for her literary works and activism. Gilman attended the Rhode Island School of Design but faced several hardships, including an unsuccessful marriage and a period of severe depression. Her struggle with mental health, particularly during a difficult postnatal period, led her to seek treatment, which inspired one of her most famous works, The Yellow Wallpaper (1892). Charlotte Perkins Gilman is best known for her short story The Yellow Wallpaper, which addresses women's mental health, the treatment of women in medical institutions, and the societal constraints placed on women. In the story, the narrator, suffering from postnatal depression, is subjected to a treatment of isolation and inactivity, which ultimately worsens her mental health. The story became an iconic critique of the restrictive roles imposed on women by both society and medicine. In addition to The Yellow Wallpaper, Gilman wrote more theoretical works, such as Women and Economics (1898), in which she argued that women should have the freedom to build careers independent of their husbands and traditional domestic roles. She advocated for women's participation in the economy, believing it would not only benefit women but society as a whole. Gilman was also a dedicated activist for women's rights, advocating for access to education for women, women's suffrage, and labor reforms. She was a strong proponent of "economic feminism," arguing that women should work outside the home and earn their own living, rather than being financially dependent on their husbands or families. Though her influence was significant during her lifetime, her work was largely forgotten for a period. However, her rediscovery in the later decades of the 20th century contributed to the revival of feminist literary studies and feminist movements. Today, Charlotte Perkins Gilman is recognized as one of the most important figures in American feminist literature and a pioneer in the women's emancipation movement. Charlotte Perkins Gilman’s legacy remains a symbol of the struggle for women’s rights and awareness of mental health issues. Many of her ideas, particularly those related to women's economic independence and their right to make decisions about their own lives, were precursors to broader movements that emerged in the 20th century.

Historical and Cultural Context

The Yellow Wallpaper, written by Charlotte Perkins Gilman in 1892, is a short story deeply embedded in the historical and cultural context of late 19th-century America, particularly in terms of women’s roles, mental health, and societal expectations. The story reflects the social, medical, and feminist concerns of its time and offers a critique of how these intersected to oppress women. In the late 1800s, American society was deeply patriarchal. Women were expected to adhere to strict roles centered around domesticity, motherhood, and submission to their husbands. Women's opportunities for education, employment, and independence were limited, and their rights in areas like marriage, property ownership, and personal autonomy were restricted. The idea of "the domestic sphere" was central: women were thought to find fulfillment and purpose within the home, where their primary duties were to nurture children and maintain the household. Gilman critiques this idea in The Yellow Wallpaper by showing how the protagonist, a woman suffering from depression, is isolated and restricted to her domestic space under the guise of rest and recuperation. Her confinement to a room—where she is forbidden to write or work—mirrors the societal restriction of women to passive, domestic roles and how this contributed to their mental and emotional suppression. During the late 19th century, mental health care, especially for women, was rudimentary and often deeply misguided. The medical community adhered to a philosophy called the "rest cure," which was developed by Dr. Silas Weir Mitchell, a prominent physician at the time. The rest cure prescribed to women suffering from nervous conditions (often diagnosed as hysteria, a common label for women's mental health issues) to rest in isolation, avoid intellectual stimulation, and refrain from physical activity. This treatment was recommended for a range of conditions, including postpartum depression, anxiety, and general emotional distress. In The Yellow Wallpaper, the protagonist's treatment by her husband—who is also her physician—follows this approach, forcing her into a state of isolation and forbidding her from engaging in activities like writing or even socializing. The protagonist's descent into madness illustrates the harmful effects of such treatment, which neglects the emotional and intellectual needs of women and often worsens their conditions. The story reflects Gilman's own personal experience with the rest cure, as she herself underwent this treatment for depression. After her treatment, she became critical of the methods, which she believed were more damaging than therapeutic. The Yellow Wallpaper is also a sharp feminist critique of the patriarchal control exerted over women's lives. The protagonist's husband, John, who is both a doctor and her caretaker, represents the male authority figure who controls every aspect of her life, even down to her treatment. His dismissal of her opinions and emotions, coupled with his belief that she is incapable of making decisions about her own health, highlights the gender inequality of the time. Throughout the story, the narrator's attempts to express herself, both through writing and by speaking out about her condition, are met with condescension. Her husband's constant infantilization of her reveals the power dynamics in marriage and the broader societal belief that women are too fragile or irrational to make important decisions. Gilman's portrayal of the protagonist's rebellion against these constraints—symbolized through her obsession with the wallpaper and eventual breakdown—can be seen as an allegory for women's struggles to assert their independence in a society that constantly oppresses them. The yellow wallpaper itself is a powerful symbol in the story. It represents the confinement and entrapment that the protagonist experiences in her domestic role. The wallpaper's pattern, which the narrator initially finds disturbing, becomes a metaphor for her mental state. Over time, she begins to see a woman trapped within the wallpaper, struggling to break free—an image that mirrors her own sense of being trapped within her home, her marriage, and the societal expectations imposed upon her. As the story progresses, the narrator's fixation on the wallpaper intensifies, and she comes to believe that she must "free" the woman trapped inside it. This act of tearing down the wallpaper symbolizes the narrator's ultimate rebellion against the oppressive forces in her life. However, her actions also reflect her descent into madness, highlighting the damaging effects of societal repression on women's mental health. Although The Yellow Wallpaper was written at a time when women's suffrage and gender equality were not yet fully realized in the United States, the story also aligns with the growing women's rights movement of the late 19th century. This was a time when women were increasingly speaking out against the social, legal, and economic inequalities they faced. In her critique of the medical treatment of women and the restrictions placed on their freedom, Gilman echoes the broader feminist arguments of the time. Women were beginning to demand the right to vote, access to higher education, and greater participation in the workforce, and Gilman's story can be seen as part of this larger push for social change. The Yellow Wallpaper reflects the social and cultural context of the late 19th century, a time when women were expected to conform to rigid domestic roles and were denied both agency and autonomy. Gilman's portrayal of a woman's descent into madness, brought on by oppressive treatments and societal constraints, challenges the medical practices of the time and critiques the way women's voices were silenced. The story is both a personal reflection of Gilman's own experiences with mental health and a powerful feminist statement against the patriarchal structures of her era.

Main Characters

In The Yellow Wallpaper, Charlotte Perkins Gilman creates a small but intense cast of characters who are central to the story's exploration of mental illness, gender roles, and oppression. The characters' interactions reflect the themes of the story, particularly the subjugation of women within the context of 19th-century social and medical practices.

The Narrator (Unnamed Woman)

The unnamed protagonist is the central character in the story. She is a woman suffering from what is diagnosed as a nervous condition, possibly postpartum depression, which leads to her confinement and treatment by her husband. Over the course of the story, the narrator becomes increasingly obsessed with the yellow wallpaper in the room where she is confined. Her deteriorating mental state serves as a powerful symbol of her growing frustration with her circumstances, as well as a critique of the medical and social treatment of women at the time. The narrator is an intelligent, creative woman who is initially unable to express herself due to the restrictions placed on her by her husband and her treatment. Her desire to write, which she is forbidden from doing, becomes a subtle rebellion against the limitations of her condition and the patriarchal system that controls her. Her mental health deteriorates as she becomes fixated on the wallpaper, and by the end of the story, she believes she has liberated the woman trapped within it, symbolizing her own desire to break free from the oppressive constraints of her life. Through the narrator, Gilman presents a powerful critique of the rest cure and the societal expectations placed on women. The narrator's descent into madness represents the destructive effects of isolation, infantilization, and the suppression of creativity and autonomy.

John

John, the narrator’s husband, is a physician, and he plays a critical role in her treatment. He embodies the paternalistic, authoritarian mindset of the time, believing that his medical expertise and male authority give him the right to control every aspect of the narrator's life, including her health, emotions, and even her thoughts. He insists that she must rest, refrain from writing or working, and be confined to a room in a secluded part of their house, all in the name of her recovery. Although John is caring and well-intentioned, his actions reveal the flaws of the medical and social systems that treat women as fragile, irrational beings. He dismisses his wife’s thoughts and feelings, believing that he knows what is best for her without ever considering her agency or allowing her to contribute to her own treatment. His treatment of her, as well as his condescending tone, reflect the limited roles that women had in marriage and society during that period. As the story progresses, John’s inability to understand the extent of his wife’s distress becomes increasingly evident. His failure to recognize her descent into madness underscores the story’s critique of the medical and patriarchal systems that were meant to "help" women but instead exacerbated their suffering.

Jennie

Jennie is the narrator’s sister-in-law, who serves as the housekeeper and caretaker for the family during the narrator’s confinement. She is depicted as a typical woman of the time—domestic, dutiful, and content with her prescribed role. Jennie is tasked with looking after the narrator and taking care of the household chores, while also acting as an additional layer of surveillance over the protagonist’s behavior. Although Jennie is a secondary character, her presence highlights the contrast between women who conform to societal expectations and those who, like the narrator, struggle to fit within these constraints.

Jennie represents the ideal woman of the period—someone who accepts her domestic role without question, serving as a model of submission to the prevailing norms. Interestingly, Jennie is also shown to be somewhat oblivious to the narrator's suffering. She takes the narrator's situation at face value and does not question the medical treatment or the narrator's deteriorating mental health. This further emphasizes the theme of women's oppression, as Jennie, despite being a woman herself, does not challenge the system that keeps both her and the narrator in restrictive roles. The main characters in The Yellow Wallpaper—the unnamed narrator, John, and Jennie—each represent different aspects of 19th-century societal views on women, marriage, and mental health. Through these characters, Gilman critiques the treatment of women in her time, particularly the medical establishment's understanding of women's mental health, the dominant gender roles that restricted women's autonomy, and the paternalistic attitudes that sought to control and suppress women. The complex dynamics between these characters ultimately serve to highlight the damaging effects of oppression and isolation, making The Yellow Wallpaper a powerful feminist work.

Plot Summary by Narrative Threads

The Yellow Wallpaper is a story that unfolds through the first-person narrative of an unnamed woman, whose descent into mental illness is chronicled over several weeks. The narrative can be understood through distinct threads, including the protagonist's mental state, her relationship with her husband, her obsession with the wallpaper, and her eventual breakdown and perceived liberation. Each narrative thread intertwines to create a complex portrayal of oppression, isolation, and mental health.

The Protagonist's Mental Health and Isolation

The story begins with the narrator detailing her recent diagnosis of a "nervous condition," likely postpartum depression. Her husband, John, a well-established physician, insists on taking her to a secluded mansion for the summer to rest and recover. The narrator is confined to a room in the mansion that she finds unsettling because of its yellow wallpaper, which she describes as "sickly" and "unpleasant." However, the most significant aspect of this narrative thread is the isolation imposed on the narrator. She is prohibited from engaging in any intellectual activity, including writing or working, which she loves.

This enforced inactivity is part of the "rest cure" prescribed by her husband, a treatment that silences her and makes her feel increasingly helpless.

As the weeks pass, the narrator becomes more distressed by the lack of mental stimulation, and her confinement exacerbates her feelings of powerlessness. Her isolation is not just physical but also emotional—she has no social interaction and little opportunity to express herself. This growing sense of confinement is mirrored in her obsession with the wallpaper, as it becomes the only object of focus in her environment.

The Husband’s Control and Dismissal of Her Experiences

John’s role as both the husband and the doctor highlights the paternalistic attitudes of the time. He dismisses his wife’s concerns, viewing them as mere fantasies or exaggerations. He continually reassures her that she will get better if she just follows his prescribed treatment, yet his approach fails to address her emotional and intellectual needs. The husband’s control over every aspect of the narrator’s life is apparent: he forbids her from writing, speaking her mind, and even seeing her child. Throughout the story, the narrator repeatedly expresses her desire to participate in normal activities, to have a more active role in her life, but John refuses to allow it. His patronizing attitude toward her, as well as his refusal to believe that her condition is worsening, deepens the sense of entrapment she feels. John insists on keeping her isolated and infantilized, believing that he knows what’s best for her, while ignoring the damage his actions are causing.

The Yellow Wallpaper and the Symbolism of the Woman Trapped in It As the narrator spends more time in the room, she becomes obsessed with the wallpaper. At first, she is repulsed by its color and pattern, which she describes as chaotic and nauseating. But soon, she begins to notice a pattern in the wallpaper that seems to shift and move. She sees a woman trapped within the design, struggling to escape. This image becomes a metaphor for the narrator's own situation—she feels as though she is trapped within the room and her circumstances, unable to break free. Her fixation on the wallpaper grows stronger as she spends more time staring at it, and she becomes increasingly convinced that the woman in the wallpaper is real. She spends hours each day “peeling” the wallpaper, trying to free the woman. The woman in the wallpaper symbolizes the narrator's own desires for freedom and agency, and her obsession with it reflects the desperate attempt to regain control over her life.

The Narrator’s Breakdown and Liberation

The final thread of the story focuses on the narrator’s mental breakdown and her perceived liberation. As the weeks pass, she becomes more deeply engrossed in her belief that the woman in the wallpaper is struggling to escape. She identifies with this woman, seeing her as a reflection of herself—trapped, confined, and struggling to break free from the oppressive forces in her life.

In the climax of the story, the narrator finally believes that she has freed the woman in the wallpaper by tearing it down. She claims to have "gotten out at last," and in a moment of madness, she circles the room repeatedly, calling herself the woman who has escaped. Her actions, while a sign of her mental deterioration, can also be interpreted as an act of defiance against the restrictions imposed on her. However, her "liberation" is bittersweet. While she perceives herself as breaking free from the wallpaper and from her oppressive circumstances, she is ultimately still trapped—within her mind and within the walls of her room. The final image of the story—her creeping around the room, having "freed" herself—suggests both her mental unraveling and her symbolic rebellion against the forces that sought to control her.

Conclusion

The narrative threads of The Yellow Wallpaper intertwine to create a rich, multifaceted portrayal of a woman’s psychological deterioration under the weight of oppressive treatment and societal expectations. The themes of isolation, control, and resistance are explored through the protagonist’s interactions with her husband, her obsession with the wallpaper, and her eventual breakdown. By weaving these threads together, Gilman critiques the patriarchal structures and medical practices of the time, offering a powerful statement on the damaging effects of repression on women’s mental and emotional well-being.

The Yellow Wallpaper — Original Story

It is very seldom that mere ordinary people like John and myself secure ancestral halls for the summer. A colonial mansion, a hereditary estate, I would say a haunted house, and reach the height of romantic felicity—but that would be asking too much of fate! Still I will proudly declare that there is something queer about it. Else, why should it be let so cheaply? And why have stood so long untenanted? John laughs at me, of course, but one expects that in marriage. John is practical in the extreme. He has no patience with faith, an intense horror of superstition, and he scoffs openly at any talk of things not to be felt and seen and put down in figures. John is a physician, and perhaps—(I would not say it to a living soul, of course, but this is dead paper and a great relief to my mind)—perhaps that is one reason I do not get well faster. You see, he does not believe I am sick! And what can one do? If a physician of high standing, and one's own husband, assures friends and relatives that there is really nothing the matter with one but temporary nervous depression—a slight hysterical tendency—what is one to do? My brother is also a physician, and also of high standing, and he says the same thing.

So I take phosphates or phosphites—whichever it is, and tonics, and journeys, and air, and exercise, and am absolutely forbidden to "work" until I am well again. Personally, I disagree with their ideas. Personally, I believe that congenial work, with excitement and change, would do me good. But what is one to do? I did write for a while in spite of them; but it does exhaust me a good deal—having to be so sly about it, or else meet with heavy opposition. I sometimes fancy that in my condition if I had less opposition and more society and stimulus—but John says the very worst thing I can do is to think about my condition, and I confess it always makes me feel bad. So I will let it alone and talk about the house. The most beautiful place! It is quite alone, standing well back from the road, quite three miles from the village. It makes me think of English places that you read about, for there are hedges and walls and gates that lock, and lots of separate little houses for the gardeners and people. There is a delicious garden! I never saw such a garden—large and shady, full of box-bordered paths, and lined with long grape-covered arbors with seats under them. There were greenhouses, too, but they are all broken now. There was some legal trouble, I believe, something about the heirs and co-heirs; anyhow, the place has been empty for years. That spoils my ghostliness, I am afraid; but I don't care—there is something strange about the house—I can feel it. I even said so to John one moonlight evening, but he said what I felt was a draught, and shut the window.

I get unreasonably angry with John sometimes. I'm sure I never used to be so sensitive. I think it is due to this nervous condition. But John says if I feel so I shall neglect proper self-control; so I take pains to control myself,—before him, at least,—and that makes me very tired.

I don't like our room a bit. I wanted one downstairs that opened on the piazza and had roses all over the window, and such pretty old-fashioned chintz hangings! but John would not hear of it. He said there was only one window and not room for two beds, and no near room for him if he took another. He is very careful and loving, and hardly lets me stir without special direction. I have a schedule prescription for each hour in the day; he takes all care from me, and so I feel basely ungrateful not to value it more. He said we came here solely on my account, that I was to have perfect rest and all the air I could get. "Your exercise depends on your strength, my dear," said he, "and your food somewhat on your appetite; but air you can absorb all the time." So we took the nursery, at the top of the house. It is a big, airy room, the whole floor nearly, with windows that look all ways, and air and sunshine galore. It was nursery first and then playground and gymnasium, I should judge; for the windows are barred for little children, and there are rings and things in the walls. The paint and paper look as if a boys' school had used it. It is stripped off—the paper—in great patches all around the head of my bed, about as far as I can reach, and in a great place on the other side of the room low down. I never saw a worse paper in my life. One of those sprawling flamboyant patterns committing every artistic sin. It is dull enough to confuse the eye in following, pronounced enough to constantly irritate, and provoke study, and when you follow the lame, uncertain curves for a little distance they suddenly commit suicide—plunge off at outrageous angles, destroy themselves in unheard-of contradictions. The color is repellant, almost revolting; a smouldering, unclean yellow, strangely faded by the slow-turning sunlight. It is a dull yet lurid orange in some places, a sickly sulphur tint in others. No wonder the children hated it! I should hate it myself if I had to live in this room long. There comes John, and I must put this away,—he hates to have me write a word. We have been here two weeks, and I haven't felt like writing before, since that first day. I am sitting by the window now, up in this atrocious nursery, and there is nothing to hinder my writing as much as I please, save lack of strength. John is away all day, and even some nights when his cases are serious. I am glad my case is not serious! But these nervous troubles are dreadfully depressing. John does not know how much I really suffer. He knows there is no reason to suffer, and that satisfies him. Of course it is only nervousness. It does weigh on me so not to do my duty in any way!

I meant to be such a help to John, such a real rest and comfort, and here I am a comparative burden already! Nobody would believe what an effort it is to do what little I am able—to dress and entertain, and order things. It is fortunate Mary is so good with the baby. Such a dear baby! And yet I cannot be with him, it makes me so nervous. I suppose John never was nervous in his life. He laughs at me so about this wallpaper! At first he meant to repaper the room, but afterwards he said that I was letting it get the better of me, and that nothing was worse for a nervous patient than to give way to such fancies. He said that after the wallpaper was changed it would be the heavy bedstead, and then the barred windows, and then that gate at the head of the stairs, and so on. “You know the place is doing you good,” he said, “and really, dear, I don’t care to renovate the house just for a three months’ rental.” “Then do let us go downstairs,” I said, “there are such pretty rooms there.” Then he took me in his arms and called me a blessed little goose, and said he would go down cellar if I wished, and have it whitewashed into the bargain. But he is right enough about the beds and windows and things. It is as airy and comfortable a room as any one need wish, and, of course, I would not be so silly as to make him uncomfortable just for a whim. I’m really getting quite fond of the big room, all but that horrid paper.

Out of one window I can see the garden, those mysterious deep-shaded arbors, the riotous old-fashioned flowers, and bushes and gnarly trees. Out of another I get a lovely view of the bay and a little private wharf belonging to the estate. There is a beautiful shaded lane that runs down there from the house. I always fancy I see people walking in these numerous paths and arbors, but John has cautioned me not to give way to fancy in the least. He says that with my imaginative power and habit of story-making a nervous weakness like mine is sure to lead to all manner of excited fancies, and that I ought to use my will and good sense to check the tendency. So I try. I think sometimes that if I were only well enough to write a little it would relieve the press of ideas and rest me. But I find I get pretty tired when I try. It is so discouraging not to have any advice and companionship about my work. When I get really well John says we will ask Cousin Henry and Julia down for a long visit; but he says he would as soon put fire-works in my pillow-case as to let me have those stimulating people about now. I wish I could get well faster. But I must not think about that. This paper looks to me as if it knew what a vicious influence it had! There is a recurrent spot where the pattern lolls like a broken neck and two bulbous eyes stare at you upside-down. I get positively angry with the impertinence of it and the everlastingness. Up and down and sideways they crawl, and those absurd, unblinking eyes are everywhere. There is one place where two breadths didn't match, and the eyes go all up and down the line, one a little higher than the other.

I never saw so much expression in an inanimate thing before, and we all know how much expression they have! I used to lie awake as a child and get more entertainment and terror out of blank walls and plain furniture than most children could find in a toy-store. I remember what a kindly wink the knobs of our big old bureau used to have, and there was one chair that always seemed like a strong friend. I used to feel that if any of the other things looked too fierce I could always hop into that chair and be safe. The furniture in this room is no worse than inharmonious, however, for we had to bring it all from downstairs. I suppose when this was used as a playroom they had to take the nursery things out, and no wonder! I never saw such ravages as the children have made here. The wallpaper, as I said before, is torn off in spots, and it sticketh closer than a brother—they must have had perseverance as well as hatred. Then the floor is scratched and gouged and splintered, the plaster itself is dug out here and there, and this great heavy bed, which is all we found in the room, looks as if it had been through the wars. But I don't mind it a bit—only the paper. There comes John's sister. Such a dear girl as she is, and so careful of me! I must not let her find me writing. She is a perfect, and enthusiastic housekeeper, and hopes for no better profession. I verily believe she thinks it is the writing which made me sick! But I can write when she is out, and see her a long way off from these windows.

There is one that commands the road, a lovely, shaded, winding road, and one that just looks off over the country. A lovely country, too, full of great elms and velvet meadows. This wallpaper has a kind of sub-pattern in a different shade, a particularly irritating one, for you can only see it in certain lights, and not clearly then. But in the places where it isn't faded, and where the sun is just so, I can see a strange, provoking, formless sort of figure, that seems to sulk about behind that silly and conspicuous front design. There's sister on the stairs! Well, the Fourth of July is over! The people are gone and I am tired out. John thought it might do me good to see a little company, so we just had mother and Nellie and the children down for a week. Of course I didn't do a thing. Jennie sees to everything now. But it tired me all the same. John says if I don't pick up faster he shall send me to Weir Mitchell in the fall. But I don't want to go there at all. I had a friend who was in his hands once, and she says he is just like John and my brother, only more so! Besides, it is such an undertaking to go so far. I don't feel as if it was worth while to turn my hand over for anything, and I'm getting dreadfully fretful and querulous. I cry at nothing, and cry most of the time. Of course I don't when John is here, or anybody else, but when I am alone. And I am alone a good deal just now. John is kept in town very often by serious cases, and Jennie is good and lets me alone when I want her to.

So I walk a little in the garden or down that lovely lane, sit on the porch under the roses, and lie down up here a good deal. I'm getting really fond of the room in spite of the wallpaper. Perhaps because of the wallpaper. It dwells in my mind so! I lie here on this great immovable bed—it is nailed down, I believe—and follow that pattern about by the hour. It is as good as gymnastics, I assure you. I start, we'll say, at the bottom, down in the corner over there where it has not been touched, and I determine for the thousandth time that I will follow that pointless pattern to some sort of a conclusion. I know a little of the principle of design, and I know this thing was not arranged on any laws of radiation, or alternation, or repetition, or symmetry, or anything else that I ever heard of. It is repeated, of course, by the breadths, but not otherwise. Looked at in one way each breadth stands alone, the bloated curves and flourishes—a kind of "debased Romanesque" with delirium tremens—go waddling up and down in isolated columns of fatuity. But, on the other hand, they connect diagonally, and the sprawling outlines run off in great slanting waves of optic horror, like a lot of wallowing seaweeds in full chase. The whole thing goes horizontally, too, at least it seems so, and I exhaust myself in trying to distinguish the order of its going in that direction. They have used a horizontal breadth for a frieze, and that adds wonderfully to the confusion. There is one end of the room where it is almost intact, and there, when the cross-lights fade and the low sun shines directly upon it, I can almost fancy radiation after all,—the interminable grotesques seem to form around a common centre and rush off in headlong plunges of equal distraction. It makes me tired to follow it. I will take a nap, I guess. I don't know why I should write this. I don't want to. I don't feel able. And I know John would think it absurd. But I must say what I feel and think in some way—it is such a relief! But the effort is getting to be greater than the relief. Half the time now I am awfully lazy, and lie down ever so much. John says I mustn't lose my strength, and has me take cod-liver oil and lots of tonics and things, to say nothing of ale and wine and rare meat. Dear

John! He loves me very dearly, and hates to have me sick. I tried to have a real earnest reasonable talk with him the other day, and tell him how I wish he would let me go and make a visit to Cousin Henry and Julia. But he said I wasn't able to go, nor able to stand it after I got there; and I did not make out a very good case for myself, for I was crying before I had finished. It is getting to be a great effort for me to think straight. Just this nervous weakness, I suppose. And dear John gathered me up in his arms, and just carried me upstairs and laid me on the bed, and sat by me and read to me till it tired my head. He said I was his darling and his comfort and all he had, and that I must take care of myself for his sake, and keep well.

He says no one but myself can help me out of it, that I must use my will and self-control and not let any silly fancies run away with me. There's one comfort, the baby is well and happy, and does not have to occupy this nursery with the horrid wallpaper. If we had not used it that blessed child would have! What a fortunate escape! Why, I wouldn't have a child of mine, an impressionable little thing, live in such a room for worlds. I never thought of it before, but it is lucky that John kept me here after all. I can stand it so much easier than a baby, you see. Of course I never mention it to them any more,—I am too wise,—but I keep watch of it all the same. There are things in that paper that nobody knows but me, or ever will. Behind that outside pattern the dim shapes get clearer every day. It is always the same shape, only very numerous. And it is like a woman stooping down and creeping about behind that pattern. I don't like it a bit. I wonder—I begin to think—I wish John would take me away from here! It is so hard to talk with John about my case, because he is so wise, and because he loves me so. But I tried it last night. It was moonlight. The moon shines in all around, just as the sun does. I hate to see it sometimes, it creeps so slowly, and always comes in by one window or another. John was asleep and I hated to waken him, so I kept still and watched the moonlight on that undulating wallpaper till I felt creepy.

The faint figure behind seemed to shake the pattern, just as if she wanted to get out. I got up softly and went to feel and see if the paper did move, and when I came back John was awake. "What is it, little girl?" he said. "Don't go walking about like that—you'll get cold." I thought it was a good time to talk, so I told him that I really was not gaining here, and that I wished he would take me away. "Why darling!" said he, "our lease will be up in three weeks, and I can't see how to leave before. "The repairs are not done at home, and I cannot possibly leave town just now. Of course if you were in any danger I could and would, but you really are better, dear, whether you can see it or not. I am a doctor, dear, and I know. You are gaining flesh and color, your appetite is better. I feel really much easier about you." "I don't weigh a bit more," said I, "nor as much; and my appetite may be better in the evening, when you are here, but it is worse in the morning when you are away." "Bless her little heart!" said he with a big hug; "she shall be as sick as she pleases! But now let's improve the shining hours by going to sleep, and talk about it in the morning!" "And you won't go away?" I asked gloomily. "Why, how can I, dear? It is only three weeks more and then we will take a nice little trip of a few days while Jennie is getting the house ready. Really, dear, you are better!" "Better in body perhaps"—I began, and stopped short, for he sat up straight and looked at me with such a stern, reproachful look that I could not say another word. "My darling," said he, "I beg of you, for my sake and for our child's sake, as well as for your own, that you will never for one instant let that idea enter your mind! There is nothing so dangerous, so fascinating, to a temperament like yours. It is a false and foolish fancy. Can you not trust me as a physician when I tell you so?" So of course I said no more on that score, and we went to sleep before long. He thought I was asleep first, but I wasn't,—I lay there for hours trying to decide whether that front pattern and the back pattern really did move together or separately. On a pattern like this, by daylight, there is a lack of sequence, a defiance of law, that is a constant irritant to a normal mind. The color is hideous enough, and unreliable enough, and infuriating enough, but the pattern is torturing. You think you have mastered it, but just as you get well under way in following, it turns a back somersault and there you are. It slaps you in the face, knocks you down, and tramples upon you. It is like a bad dream. The outside pattern is a florid arabesque, reminding one of a fungus. If you can imagine a toadstool in joints, an interminable string of toadstools, budding and sprouting in endless convolutions,—why, that is something like it. That is, sometimes! There is one marked peculiarity about this paper, a thing nobody seems to notice but myself, and that is that it changes as the light changes. When the sun shoots in through the east window—I always watch for that first long, straight ray—it changes so quickly that I never can quite believe it. That is why I watch it always. By moonlight—the moon shines in all night when there is a moon—I wouldn't know it was the same paper.

At night in any kind of light, in twilight, candlelight, lamplight, and worst of all by moonlight, it becomes bars! The outside pattern I mean, and the woman behind it is as plain as can be. I didn't realize for a long time what the thing was that showed behind,—that dim sub-pattern,—but now I am quite sure it is a woman. By daylight she is subdued, quiet. I fancy it is the pattern that keeps her so still. It is so puzzling. It keeps me quiet by the hour. I lie down ever so much now. John says it is good for me, and to sleep all I can. Indeed, he started the habit by making me lie down for an hour after each meal. It is a very bad habit, I am convinced, for, you see, I don't sleep. And that cultivates deceit, for I don't tell them I'm awake,—oh, no! The fact is, I am getting a little afraid of John. He seems very queer sometimes, and even Jennie has an inexplicable look. It strikes me occasionally, just as a scientific hypothesis, that perhaps it is the paper! I have watched John when he did not know I was looking, and come into the room suddenly on the most innocent excuses, and I've caught him several times looking at the paper! And Jennie too. I caught Jennie with her hand on it once. She didn't know I was in the room, and when I asked her in a quiet, a very quiet voice, with the most restrained manner possible, what she was doing with the paper she turned around as if she had been caught stealing, and looked quite angry—asked me why I should frighten her so! Then she said that the paper stained everything it touched, that she had found yellow smooches on all my clothes and John's, and she wished we would be more careful! Did not that sound innocent? But I know she was studying that pattern, and I am determined that nobody shall find it out but myself!

Life is very much more exciting now than it used to be. You see I have something more to expect, to look forward to, to watch. I really do eat better, and am more quiet than I was. John is so pleased to see me improve! He laughed a little the other day, and said I seemed to be flourishing in spite of my wallpaper. I turned it off with a laugh. I had no intention of telling him it was because of the wallpaper—he would make fun of me. He might even want to take me away. I don't want to leave now until I have found it out. There is a week more, and I think that will be enough. I'm feeling ever so much better! I don't sleep much at night, for it is so interesting to watch developments; but I sleep a good deal in the daytime. In the daytime it is tiresome and perplexing. There are always new shoots on the fungus, and new shades of yellow all over it. I cannot keep count of them, though I have tried conscientiously. It is the strangest yellow, that wallpaper! It makes me think of all the yellow things I ever saw—not beautiful ones like buttercups, but old foul, bad yellow things.

But there is something else about that paper—the smell! I noticed it the moment we came into the room, but with so much air and sun it was not bad. Now we have had a week of fog and rain, and whether the windows are open or not, the smell is here. It creeps all over the house. I find it hovering in the dining-room, skulking in the parlor, hiding in the hall, lying in wait for me on the stairs. It gets into my hair. Even when I go to ride, if I turn my head suddenly and surprise it—there is that smell! Such a peculiar odor, too! I have spent hours in trying to analyze it, to find what it smelled like. It is not bad—at first, and very gentle, but quite the subtlest, most enduring odor I ever met. In this damp weather it is awful. I wake up in the night and find it hanging over me. It used to disturb me at first. I thought seriously of burning the house—to reach the smell. But now I am used to it. The only thing I can think of that it is like is the color of the paper! A yellow smell. There is a very funny mark on this wall, low down, near the mopboard. A streak that runs round the room. It goes behind every piece of furniture, except the bed, a long, straight, even smooch, as if it had been rubbed over and over. I wonder how it was done and who did it, and what they did it for. Round and round and round—round and round and round—it makes me dizzy! I really have discovered something at last. Through watching so much at night, when it changes so, I have finally found out.

The front pattern does move—and no wonder! The woman behind shakes it! Sometimes I think there are a great many women behind, and sometimes only one, and she crawls around fast, and her crawling shakes it all over. Then in the very bright spots she keeps still, and in the very shady spots she just takes hold of the bars and shakes them hard. And she is all the time trying to climb through. But nobody could climb through that pattern—it strangles so; I think that is why it has so many heads. They get through, and then the pattern strangles them off and turns them upside-down, and makes their eyes white! If those heads were covered or taken off it would not be half so bad. I think that woman gets out in the daytime! And I'll tell you why—privately—I've seen her! I can see her out of every one of my windows! It is the same woman, I know, for she is always creeping, and most women do not creep by daylight. I see her on that long shaded lane, creeping up and down. I see her in those dark grape arbors, creeping all around the garden. I see her on that long road under the trees, creeping along, and when a carriage comes she hides under the blackberry vines. I don't blame her a bit. It must be very humiliating to be caught creeping by daylight! I always lock the door when I creep by daylight. I can't do it at night, for I know John would suspect something at once. And John is so queer now, that I don't want to irritate him. I wish he would take another room! Besides, I don't want anybody to get that woman out at night but myself.

I often wonder if I could see her out of all the windows at once. But, turn as fast as I can, I can only see out of one at one time. And though I always see her she may be able to creep faster than I can turn! I have watched her sometimes away off in the open country, creeping as fast as a cloud shadow in a high wind. If only that top pattern could be gotten off from the under one! I mean to try it, little by little. I have found out another funny thing, but I shan't tell it this time! It does not do to trust people too much. There are only two more days to get this paper off, and I believe John is beginning to notice. I don't like the look in his eyes. And I heard him ask Jennie a lot of professional questions about me. She had a very good report to give. She said I slept a good deal in the daytime. John knows I don't sleep very well at night, for all I'm so quiet! He asked me all sorts of questions, too, and pretended to be very loving and kind. As if I couldn't see through him! Still, I don't wonder he acts so, sleeping under this paper for three months. It only interests me, but I feel sure John and Jennie are secretly affected by it. Hurrah! This is the last day, but it is enough. John is to stay in town over night, and won't be out until this evening. Jennie wanted to sleep with me—the sly thing! but I told her I should undoubtedly rest better for a night all alone.

That was clever, for really I wasn't alone a bit! As soon as it was moonlight, and that poor thing began to crawl and shake the pattern, I got up and ran to help her. I pulled and she shook, I shook and she pulled, and before morning we had peeled off yards of that paper. A strip about as high as my head and half around the room. And then when the sun came and that awful pattern began to laugh at me I declared I would finish it today! We go away tomorrow, and they are moving all my furniture down again to leave things as they were before. Jennie looked at the wall in amazement, but I told her merrily that I did it out of pure spite at the vicious thing. She laughed and said she wouldn't mind doing it herself, but I must not get tired. How she betrayed herself that time! But I am here, and no person touches this paper but me—not alive! She tried to get me out of the room—it was too patent! But I said it was so quiet and empty and clean now that I believed I would lie down again and sleep all I could; and not to wake me even for dinner—I would call when I woke. So now she is gone, and the servants are gone, and the things are gone, and there is nothing left but that great bedstead nailed down, with the canvas mattress we found on it. We shall sleep downstairs to-night, and take the boat home to-morrow. I quite enjoy the room, now it is bare again. How those children did tear about here! This bedstead is fairly gnawed! But I must get to work.

I have locked the door and thrown the key down into the front path. I don't want to go out, and I don't want to have anybody come in, till John comes. I want to astonish him. I've got a rope up here that even Jennie did not find. If that woman does get out, and tries to get away, I can tie her! But I forgot I could not reach far without anything to stand on! This bed will not move! I tried to lift and push it until I was lame, and then I got so angry I bit off a little piece at one corner—but it hurt my teeth. Then I peeled off all the paper I could reach standing on the floor. It sticks horribly and the pattern just enjoys it! All those strangled heads and bulbous eyes and waddling fungus growths just shriek with derision! I am getting angry enough to do something desperate. To jump out of the window would be admirable exercise, but the bars are too strong even to try. Besides I wouldn't do it. Of course not. I know well enough that a step like that is improper and might be misconstrued. I don't like to look out of the windows even—there are so many of those creeping women, and they creep so fast. I wonder if they all come out of that wallpaper as I did? But I am securely fastened now by my well-hidden rope—you don't get me out in the road there! I suppose I shall have to get back behind the pattern when it comes night, and that is hard! It is so pleasant to be out in this great room and creep around as I please!

I don't want to go outside. I won't, even if Jennie asks me to. For outside you have to creep on the ground, and everything is green instead of yellow. But here I can creep smoothly on the floor, and my shoulder just fits in that long smooch around the wall, so I cannot lose my way. Why, there's John at the door! It is no use, young man, you can't open it! How he does call and pound! Now he's crying for an axe. It would be a shame to break down that beautiful door! "John dear!" said I in the gentlest voice, "the key is down by the front steps, under a plantain leaf!" That silenced him for a few moments. Then he said—very quietly indeed, "Open the door, my darling!" "I can't," said I. "The key is down by the front door under a plantain leaf!" And then I said it again, several times, very gently and slowly, and said it so often that he had to go and see, and he got it, of course, and came in. He stopped short by the door. “What is the matter?” he cried. “For God’s sake, what are you doing!” I kept on creeping just the same, but I looked at him over my shoulder. “I’ve got out at last,” said I, “in spite of you and Jane! And I’ve pulled off most of the paper, so you can’t put me back!” Now why should that man have fainted? But he did, and right across my path by the wall, so that I had to creep over him every time!
